Children's National[®]

The Voices Study: Learning from youth about their care needs and priorities

About this study: Researchers at Children's National Hospital (Washington, D.C.) in partnership with a network of US children's hospitals are working to understand the care needs and experiences of young people with Klinefelter Syndrome.

Who can participate:

Young people (ages 11-21) with Klinefelter Syndrome are invited to be part of this project.

What are the goals of the project?

We are working with young people to create a new self-advocacy tool to help youth with Klinefelter Syndrome communicate their care preferences and needs. All information gathered will be confidential.

What to expect:

Participants are invited to complete online questionnaires. Some participants will be invited to complete an online interview. Participants will be compensated between $120 - $230 for their time based on which parts of the study they complete.
